

Yorkshire Pudding

give depth to the overall foodscape of the United States that would otherwise simply be known for their stupendous hamburgers, steak dinners and apple pies. Much of the food of the USA also tends to stem from outside influences that are then firmly embossed with a stars and stripes shaped stamp and branded as their own. Whole new commingled cuisines have emerged within the vast land; such as the ever-popular American-Chinese, with dishes like egg rolls, ginger beef and chow mein and Italian-American meatballs, deep dish pizza and lasagne that bear little resemblance to what's found in the countries of origin and are a truly delicious stateside invention.

Where to find it: For an authentic American steak, baked potato, hamburger with all the fixings, bowl of clam chowder, chicken quesadilla or a big ol' plate of baby back ribs, you can find it all under Dan Ryan's 1940's Chicago-inspired roof.

England

Savoury meat pies, roast dinners, afternoon tea, shepherd's pie, fish and chips, and the ones with the funny names like bangers and mash and bubble and squeak (corned beef hash) are all top of the English food charts. Makes you salivate just reading about it – or maybe makes you pop a button just thinking about eating it. The food of Blighty is typically hearty fare and is accompanied by its adopted and modified Indian cuisine such as Chicken Tikka Masala that is often called the national dish of Britain.

Where to find it: English food is unsurprisingly easy to find in Hong Kong and this aptly named eatery serves authentic British food like those mentioned above as well as a variety of pies, stews, roasts, and of course, Yorkshire pudding.
